

Urban Growth Outside the Walled City of Tripoli, Libya: Two Colonial Approaches

Authors : Fathia Elmenghawi

Abstract : The transformation of cities under colonial rule has received a great deal of scholarly work. Colonizers interpret their colonies differently and many urban and planning approaches can be traced. This paper focuses on the colonial approaches of urban expansion in the city of Tripoli, Libya during two colonial periods, the late Ottomans and the Italians, from the 1830s to 1940s. Both had perceived their approaches to the city's expansion as means of practicing dominance over the colonized under the disguise of facilitating the process of modernization of the city. This research uses a historical method that based on archival documents such as maps, photos, and publications to uncover the planning practices followed by the two colonizers. The findings indicate that despite the similar intentions that both colonizers had when they expanded the city, one striking difference was distinguished, which is how the Ottomans and the Italians planned to treat the Walled City as, respectively, either a context for expansion or as merely remains to marginalize.

Keywords : colonial urban planning, Italian colonization, Ottoman provinces, walled city

Conference Title : ICCATP 2020 : International Conference on Colonial Architecture and Town Planning

Conference Location : Bangkok, Thailand

Conference Dates : February 03-04, 2020