

Structural Stress of Hegemon's Power Loss: A Pestle Analysis for Pacification and Security Policy Plan

Authors : Sehrish Qayyum

Abstract : Active military power contention is shifting to economic and cyberwar to retain hegemony. Attuned Pestle analysis confirms that structural stress of hegemon's power loss drives a containment approach towards caging actions. Ongoing diplomatic, asymmetric, proxy and direct wars are increasing stress hegemon's power retention due to tangled military and economic alliances. It creates the condition of catalepsy with defective reflexive control which affects the core warfare operations. When one's own power is doubted it gives power to one's own doubt to ruin all planning either done with superlative cost-benefit analysis. Strategically calculated estimation of Hegemon's power game since the early WWI to WWII, WWII-to Cold War and then to the current era in three chronological periods exposit that Thucydides's trap became the reason for war broke out. Thirst for power is the demise of imagination and cooperation for better sense to prevail instead it drives ashes to dust. Pestle analysis is a wide array of evaluation from political and economic to legal dimensions of the state matters. It helps to develop the Pacification and Security Policy Plan (PSPP) to avoid hegemon's structural stress of power loss in fact, in turn, creates an alliance with maximum amicable outputs. PSPP may serve to regulate and pause the hurricane of power clashes. PSPP along with a strategic work plan is based on Pestle analysis to deal with any conceivable war condition and approach for saving international peace. Getting tangled into self-imposed epistemic dilemmas results in regret that becomes the only option of performance. It is a generic application of probability tests to find the best possible options and conditions to develop PSPP for any adversity possible so far. Innovation in expertise begets innovation in planning and action-plan to serve as a rheostat approach to deal with any plausible power clash.

Keywords : alliance, hegemon, pestle analysis, pacification and security policy plan, security

Conference Title : ICSSS 2020 : International Conference on Strategy and Security Studies

Conference Location : Jeddah, Saudi Arabia

Conference Dates : November 16-17, 2020