

Embodied Spirituality in Gestalt Therapy

Authors : Silvia Alaimo

Abstract : This lecture brings to our attention the theme of spirituality within Gestalt therapy's theoretical and clinical perspectives and which is closely connected to the fertile emptiness and creative indifference' experiences. First of all, the premise that must be done is the overcoming traditional western culture's philosophical and religious misunderstandings, such as the dicotomy between spirituality and pratical/material daily life, as well as the widespread secular perspective of classic psychology. Even fullness and emptiness have traditionally been associated with the concepts of being and not being. "There is only one way through which we can contact the deepest layers of our existence, rejuvenate our thinking and reach intuition (the harmony of thought and being): inner silence" (Perls) *. Therefore, "fertile void" doesn't mean empty in itself, but rather an useful condition of every creative and responsible act, making room for a deeper dimension close to spirituality. Spirituality concerns questions about the meaning of existence, which lays beyond the concrete and literal dimension, looking for the essence of things, and looking at the value of personal experience. Looking at fundamentals of Gestalt epistemology, phenomenology, aesthetics, and the relationship, we can reach the heart of a therapeutic work that takes spiritual contours and which are based on an embodied (incarnate size), through the relational aesthetic knowledge (Spagnuolo Lobb), the deep contact with each other, the role of compassion and responsibility, as the patient's recognition criteria (Orange, 2013) rooted in the body. The aesthetic dimension, like the spiritual dimension to which it is often associated, is a subtle dimension: it is the dimension of the essence of things, of their "soul." In clinical practice, it implies that the relationship between therapist and patient is "in the absence of judgment," also called "zero point of creative indifference," expressed by 'therapeutic mentality'. It consists in following with interest and authentic curiosity where the patient wants to go and support him in his intentionality of contact. It's a condition of pure and simple awareness, of the full acceptance of "what is," a moment of detachment from one's own life in which one does not take oneself too seriously, a starting point for finding a center of balance and integration that brings to the creative act, to growth, and, as Perls would say, to the excitement and adventure of living.

Keywords : spirituality, bodily, embodied aesthetics, phenomenology, relationship

Conference Title : ICSCP 2022 : International Conference on Spirituality and Clinical Psychology

Conference Location : London, United Kingdom

Conference Dates : February 15-16, 2022