

Anti-Language in Jordanian Spoken Arabic: A Sociolinguistic Perspective

Authors : Ahmad Mohammad Al-Harashsheh

Abstract : Anti-language reflects anti-society; it is a restricted spoken code used among a group of interlocutors because of anti-society. This study aims to shed light on the sociolinguistic characteristics of anti-language used by prisoners in Jordan. The participants included were 15 male-Jordanian prisoners who have recently been released. The data were written, transliterated, and analyzed on the basis of sociolinguistics and discourse analysis. This study draws on sociolinguistic theory of language codes as the theoretical framework. The study concludes that anti-language is a male language and is used for secrecy, as the prisoners' tendency to protect themselves from the police; it is a verbal competition, contest and display. In addition, it is employed to express obnoxious ideas and acts by using more pleasant or blurred words and expressions. Also, the anti-language used by prisoners has six linguistic characteristics in JSA (Jordanian Spoken Arabic), such as relexicalization, neologism, rhyme formation, semantic change, derivation, and metaphorical expressions.

Keywords : anti-language, Jordanian Spoken Arabic, sociolinguistics, prisoners

Conference Title : ICLLTL 2016 : International Conference on Linguistics, Language Teaching and Learning

Conference Location : Paris, France

Conference Dates : May 16-17, 2016